

Two men were living. They took house locations. One, he was building his house; the other, he himself was building his house. They built them and finished. The one from grass he wove his house roof and was stacking it; he tied them and went up. The other, it was earth he dug up and threw. He spread it out over his house roof up to the ridgepole and then he spread it on the other side, down to the roof edge and finished. That done, he tried to see the other's. He went. He (the first man) was going up to tie his house with grass. This (the second man) saw, he said, "Aga! Why are you doing it with grass? Later your wife and children will try to go into the house. They will try to do this. The grass hanging down will poke their eyes. You should do like I did." So he said. Then he (the other) said, "All right! I want to do it this way." So he said.

They finished building their houses. Then their wives and children all went to live. They were staying. One day the sky was bad: the horizon was blowing hard, it was trying to bring up its wind and rain. These were against them. They, their wives and children, all went into their houses and waited. They were staying when that one who was building with earth, his house - that earth around the ridgepole became soft. The house ridge began to open here. The ground was soft. It broke and fell down into inside the house. That's what happened. The rain was coming down hard inside the house. The man said to his wife and children, "Quick! Quick! Get ready! Get the children! We'll go to your in-law's house." They got up and went. The other man, his wife and children were staying in his house as they went and were standing. He said, "Wo! Cousin! Open the door? The wife and children came in?" He replied, "But what's wrong with you and the house?" He said, "That ground for the house went soft, it spread out and broke down and fell down into the house. While the rain did the house very bad so we came here to you." His cousin said, "Agagagaga! Take your wife and children. Go! Later they might poke their eyes with grass. I will not open and let you come in." (The other man) with his wife and children slept under the house. Dawn came; then he himself wove that grass and stacked it. He threw it down and left it. The he tied up his house roof with the grass. Then his wife and children together went into the house and stayed.
